Sounds like a long morning...

We went out to Easter Brunch, a treat by Pam's mom, at the Inn at Lark Creek (same place we went for Thanksgiving in Larkspur). Thanksgiving was better food. Yesterday, the chef was trying a little too hard. Breakfast potatoes are simple, just add salt and pan fry. They don't need 17 herbs! Can you tell I've been trying to cook more lately, owing to the need to stop eating so much packaged food to reduce sodium intake for Pam – she got diagnosed with high blood pressure (hereditary), but it's been totally freaking her out! Anyway, we've made real food for the week on the past 5 Sundays in a row, thanks to recipes from the Martha Stewart magazine. It's cracking us up... I would not say we're good cooks, but we're improving.

In other news: unplug your toaster. Two weeks ago (actually the same day your dad died, I think) my sister's house almost totally burned down because of a defective newish toaster that spontaneously caught fire while they were gone for about 45 minutes. Thanks to a heroic neighbor who happened to be grilling outside behind them at the time, their 5 pets are safe and their house did not sustain major structural damage. But according to the fire department, they wouldn't have been able to get there in time to save the house at all if it weren't for the neighbor. So, unplug your toaster and get to know your neighbors! The silver lining is that Janet and Sarah will get a brand new kitchen out of this in the end (not to mention a totally repainted house and mostly new furnishings) though they expect not to be able to live in their house for at least 4-6 months.

Can you tell I should be writing a PD at the moment?

See you Friday for lunch...

Julie

Love your concise description! We had a great Easter in TX. I just came back this morning (up at 4:30, flight out at 7:15, arrive SFO 9 am, in office by 9:45 . . . pretty good, really.)

But I have a houseguest who was here through the weekend and doesn't leave til tomorrow. I'd prefer to be home alone tonight, but that's it.

What did you do this weekend?

I doubt it. Maybe you might have because she helped organize the golf tournament and food from the bar? Otherwise, she has been generally beneath the radar. She is relatively young and blond, if that helps at all.

Hope you had a nice Easter.

J.

Charlyn Hook is going over to Ferron's office. She has been at the CPUC since 2000. I can't place her. Do you think I would have run across her when I was there?
