Subject: FB, KFSN, KMJ - PG&E Worker Has Broken Leg After Washington Man Rammed Him

PG&E Worker Has Broken Leg After Washington Man Rammed Him

A Pacific Gas & Electric worker rammed by a driver from Washington state has a broken leg and will need to remain in Community Regional Medical Center for a couple more days.

The 37-year-old worker, who has been with PG&E for five years, asked not to be identified. But he was talking to family members and in good spirits Saturday, said Denny Boyles, PG&E spokesman.

"It's not his belief that anyone should be angry with the driver," Boyles said. "He just hopes the man gets the help he needs."

Fresno County Sheriff's deputies arrested Jett Simmons McBride, 54, of Tacoma, Wash., for ramming his car into the worker. McBride was booked into Fresno County Jail early Saturday on suspicion of attempted murder. His bail was set at $1 million.

About 2 p.m. Friday, McBride drove his car toward a PG&E work crew and their truck, wedging workers between the two vehicles along McKinley Avenue near Marks Avenue west of Highway 99.

McBride had picked up a hitchhiker who said McBride was making racist remarks when he came upon the PG&E workers, one of whom was black.

McBride lodged the black worker between his car and the work truck, got out of his car and began beating the worker and attacking others who tried to stop him.

The hitchhiker then got out of the car and started hitting McBride with a hatchet, officials said.

The hitchhiker eventually knocked out McBride, who is 6 feet 4 inches tall and weighs 290 pounds, according to jail records.

The PG&E worker who was hurt will need six to eight weeks to recover. But, Boyles said, his main concern Saturday "was getting a new pair of boots because his were cut off" by paramedics.

Man Identified Who Hit PG&E Workers

New information has come about the bizarre attack that injured a PG&E worker Friday.

The Fresno County Sheriff's Office identified the suspect as Jett Simmons McBride of Tacoma, Wash.

Investigators say the 54-year-old rammed his car into the PG&E worker on McKinley Avenue near Marks Avenue, and then got out and beat the victim and others who tried to stop the attack.

McBride is now being held at Community Regional Medical Center on attempted murder charges.

His bail is set at $1 million.

PG&E says the 37-year-old victim had surgery yesterday on a broken leg and is expected to be in the hospital for another day or two.

Driver Who Ran Into PG&E Workers Identified

New details emerged Saturday about the driver who was arrested for ramming his car into a PG&E worker Friday afternoon.

Authorities identified the driver as Jett McBride, 54, of Tacoma, Washington.

They say McBride had picked up a hitch-hiker, who said McBride was making racist remarks when he came upon three PG&E workers near Marks and McKinley avenues.

McBride allegedly ran into and injured one of the workers -- then got out of his car and started beating the worker.

The hitch-hiker then got out and started hitting McBride with a hatchet.
