A day without email – SWEET! But probably paying for it today! I will have confirmation from Accenture on their speaker and Matt Rogers by tomorrow. . . . but I think it is looking good. Bain/Joe actually looked at the write-up and provided some minor edits . . .see below. Joe wanted to broaden the discussion beyond just disruptive technologies and wanted to frame the business models in terms of scenarios. The use of the term “scenario” to outline potential future business models is commonly used in the strategic planning process.

Folks are really excited and honored at the opportunity to participate. Matt is actually rearranging travel plans on 10/8 to make this work (I owe him big time!). Once they confirm tomorrow – I will send you and the presenters an email to introduce and for your follow-up. Let me know if you need anything else I copied Meredith and Brooke to keep us all in the loop.

Deb

Joe’s suggested edits / original language below

The electric utility industry globally is facing a period of significant disruption that provide both challenges to and opportunities for utilities and regulators alike. Mr. Scalise will lay out the “signposts” that indicate where changes are coming, several possible future scenarios for potential business models for the California industry and what each of these outcomes might mean for the utilities, regulators, energy markets and customers.

Hi Deb, checking in to see if you have secured confirmation from McKinsey and Accenture? Our email has been down the past day and a half, so any emails you may have sent have not been received.

Also, we would like to get an official letter out to joe scalise this week, so I'd like to confirm his expectations and contact info.

Thanks, Kristin
