Wow, I don't even hold out hope that being non-facebook will be considered cool. I mean, for goodness sake, it turns out the NSA is following our every move, and I haven't heard any pals saying they will abandon social media. I think they are idiots, and I think that almost everyone will live to regret something they put up (I can give examples!). And I think twitter is almost almost beneath parody. Although I love the Doonesbury parody of it.

Indeed. But I love saabnet.net

I am waiting for a time in the future where some of my peers will no longer see me as a luddite for staying off social media, and they themselves will be embarrassed to have ever been a part of it. I may be waiting a long time.

I have been thinking of a twitter account that pokes fun of twitter. But I'm sure that's already been done a lot better than I'd ever do it. I thought I could start with a recurring joke that would simply be "tweet!" And maybe some musings on the past tense conjugation of having submitted a tweet. "Is that a twat?"

Heh. I'm deeply disturbed by the whole twitter/facebook level of interaction. It makes the car owners' group fora participant conversations, like the ones on saabnet, look deep.
