Thanks. I also couldn't help myself and bashed the sierra club a bit, but my response was pretty nerdy about how rate design really works (more that the issue on fixed charges isn't the NEM customer paying the charge, but that EVERYONE else paid the charge, and the volumetric rate goes down.) I figured it would be too technical to get into the article, but might make Lifsher a little cautious about what he was hearing. As for my quote, I think I repeated some variant of those two sentences about 5 times in my 15 minute discussion... just to be sure.

Sorry you got admonished, but I don't recall seeing "celebrate success" in the pyramid getting you to "be the leading utility in the united states." ☺

I'm spending more time thinking about how to squeeze more fun into the waning warm days of the year than rate design, at this point...

I heard! Congratulations and really nice quote in the LA Times, by the way. It was a really balanced article, esp considering the reporter.

I haven't said anything to anybody all week because I didn't want to curse it. I think perhaps I had a little too much pent-up enthusiasm because I just got chastised for being overly effusive in my congratulatory email to the internal team here this morning. There I go again, celebrating success....

Was unanimous. Nice working with you on this one... ☺
