Oh, wow, so the flite has what I like -- an actual saddle point? But it still has a shell, right? That's what I liked about my cheapy fuji saddle -- little padding, a saddle pt, and vinyl cover.

I used to like the turbo until I started riding a lot more ... then I found I too soft. I like the flite because it has a slight "saddle" feature, and it is real leather, and it is pretty long, so there are lots of posiiions to allow micro-adjusments while riding.

I think I have ten of these saddles. They last forever. My oldest is 20 years old, and is starting have the leather bubble up a bit ... but still is perfectly fine when riding.

I also like the shape of the WTB Silverado saddle. Comfy!! Less pricey. I have on my MTBs, as I sit less on those.

I was looking at the soma knockoff: <http://www.somafab.com/archives/product/hishou-saddles>

They also make a knockoff Turbo, and the turbos used to work for me. I hate the whole saddle thing – you end up trying 3 or more.

My fave is the old version, the classic. They went away for a while, but public outcry was huge. Now they are back (although expensive, and not every online retailer carries them ... but you can find them).

LOVE the classic flite.
