Ouch. I remember that about working at Navajo. There was basically nothing to offer employees with pay or anything else, so I ended up spending sooo much money on that kind of thing. Between that and the increased need for entertainment, I wasn't saving much. Oh, I remember taking them on a US-grant paid trip down the Colorado. That was cool, but I couldn't give them a bonus.

I also am part of taking out my rates group for lunch (along with Joe and Linda) on friday. So I'm paying 33% of lunch for 12 people. That's my going out for lunch budget for a month and a half. Sigh. There are some things I miss about PG&E – my corporate card for things like this was one of them.

Lame. Glad you're done. B/c you're a pro, that experience will not leak into the Up-With-People-Style gushing note on the person you picked.

As managers, we don't fight these little battles. We suck.

I was directed to do it. I did it. It took 20 minutes to call the 8 people. How the personnel secretary-level person didn't have 20 minutes is beyond me.

God, I am sure. I still can't believe this is considered more reasonable than sending emails from whatever fucking source.

No. she was fine. But she took very detailed notes and asked good follow up questions. I felt like a heel.
